NOTE TO STUDENTS

Except for Fiction, all books are listed together regardless of the years in which they should be read. Under Fiction there is a separate list of books that should not be read above the first year of the regular (four-year) high school. These are meant for the first year and for the junior high school. Under all other headings, books of this kind are followed by the figure 1 and by no other figure. Such books should not be read after the first year unless the teacher, for some special reason, gives permission.

The figures 1, 2, 3, and 4 indicate the four years in the regular high-school course. Not very many books are set down for the first year only. There are many easy and interesting books that might be set down in this group. The makers of this list have preferred to select only a few. They feel that the young folks who enter high school, even junior high school, should be too ambitious, too eager to "grow up," to be contented with books written especially for children. It is almost as easy, and much more interesting, to learn to enjoy the livelier and more readable of the books that grown-ups are reading.

By looking at the descriptive headings and at the descriptions in parenthesis and at the numerals that follow, you can tell whether the book is likely to appeal to you. On the whole, a student gets the most good out of a book just a bit too old for him, just as in high-jumping, or other athletic sports, he is always trying to improve his record. Remember, too, that a book that bored you yesterday may interest you today. Yesterday you were too short to reach the shelf that you reach with ease today. Your mind grows as well as your body. Perhaps if you try the book again you will wonder why you could not see how good it was.

A few books are marked 4x. These are a little too hard or too serious for the average student of the graduating year. But there are always students who are a little above the average, students who, like explorers and adventurers, like to attack tasks that look temptingly hard, that give them a chance to try their powers. These books are put here for their benefit.

The wise student will not limit himself to books of one kind. Life has many sides and many interests and one needs to learn about them all. You can do that by selecting broadly and wisely from the varied list we have set before you. This may seem to disagree with the fact that we have given many books by one writer. The point is that you would not read these all at once and only these. It may, however, be possible to read these in other years or as additional reading in leisure moments. Do not think of reading as a school duty. It can become one of life's greatest pleasures. It is one of the finest habits you can form. And do not forget, in using this list, that our object in making it is to help you find books you will like to read.

FOR THE FIRST YEAR AND FOR JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL

FICTION ONLY

(Not to be credited in higher grades without special permission)

See also, in the General List, books followed by the numeral 1, or by no numeral. Any book from the General List may be read with the teacher's permission. For all subjects except Fiction, see the General List. $\frac{1}{2}$ or $\frac{1}{4}$ indicates a book too short for full credit.

POEMS

Individual poems and volumes of poems by one poet are not listed unless the author is of marked importance, or is particularly fitted for school reading. For selected poems of most authors, see the Collections. The reading of a large part of the poems in any good collection will count as the reading of a book. Of course the teacher, in allowing credit, will consider whether the poetry consists of light stories in easy verse or of poetry that calls for thought and imagination.

INDIVIDUAL POEMS

The World's Greatest Poems—All Should Know Them

The Iliad (Omitting Books 11, 13, 15, 17, 21) (Translation of Bryant, Lang, or Chapman) (4)	Homer	1, 2, 3, 4
